PLEDGE - Go outside every day (to reduce screen time, get fresh air, and go for walks).

Question 1

Expectations – Expectations are the results a person believe will happen after a certain action or the outcome they get from doing it. E.g, if I think that going outside every day would make me feel relaxed, the expectation of making me feel relaxed later in the day would motivate me to actually do it.

Behavioral Capability - Behavioral capability means having the knowledge and skills to perform a particular behavior. It is not just wanting to do something but knowing how to do it. In my case, I already knew how to pick a route i am familiar with, pick clothes for the weather, and how to get home in case of an emergency.

Self-Efficacy - Self-efficacy is how confident someone is in their ability to do a behavior. It's believing "I can actually do this." I had decent self-efficacy because I knew I could make time to step outside each day, even if it was just for ten minutes.

Question 2

From a bunch of pledges, you selected one particular pledge. Why did you select that pledge?

I chose to go outside every day because I was spending way too much time indoors on my phone and computer, especially after having a long day at school. My expectations were that going outside would clear my head, help me feel calmer, reduce anxiety, and reduce my screen time. My behavioral capability supported that choice because I already enjoy walking while listening to music and live in a city where its beautiful, safe and easy to go out safely. I also felt confident that this was something I could actually stick with since It wasn't a huge lifestyle change, just something small that would help me feel better every day.

Question 3

What rewards did you receive or give yourself to help you stick with your pledge for the full 2 weeks? How well did they work?

My reward for keeping up with the pledge was letting myself play video games or watch movies after going outside. It made my routine feel balanced because I could relax and enjoy something I loved after. It also gave me motivation, and I'd remind myself that once I got my walk done, I could chill and have fun without feeling guilty. Giving myself a reward worked really well and helped me stay consistent throughout the two weeks, even though I missed a couple of days when I had work.

Question 4

Define resilience.

According to the American Psychological Association, Resilience is the ability to recover from or adapt well in the face of adversity, trauma, or tragedy. It is about handling stress and challenges in a healthy way and coming out stronger than before. It does not mean to never get tired or upset it means to bounce back, learn and recover in the face of adversity

Question 5

Talk about the ways in which your pledge did (or didn't) contribute to your own resilience and to the resilience of the Brock campus community.

My pledge definitely helped my resilience. By going outside every day, I started to feel a lot calmer, more energetic, and more in control of my mood. It reminded me that even small actions can make a big difference in how I feel. When I missed a day or two because of work, I was not hard on myself, I just got back on track the next day, which showed growth in how I handle setbacks.

Through reciprocal determinism, my behavior, personal growth, and environment all worked together. My behavior (walking and going outside) improved my mindset and energy, and that made me more likely to engage with my environment, like being more social and focused. If more students on campus took similar pledges, it could help create a healthier and more supportive community overall where people take small daily actions to manage stress and improve their well-being.
